Join us as we explore how SPV adapts to the interests of those immersed in pre-vocational secondary education, and the attributes that have enabled it to rise to such a prestigious position.

Approaching an incredible two decades of excellence, SPV is an organisation whose primary focus on pre-vocational secondary education has enabled the formulation of award-winning strategies to ensure the success of a mixture of teachers. Predominantly centring its efforts around representing those engrossed in politics, education, culture, and sciences, the group coalesces the input of educational practitioners and policy makers to create a solid foundation upon which its outstanding programs rest. As a result, it became one of the very first initiators of new, pre-vocational secondary education, and it now stands as a project leader of additional subsidiaries that further represent its expertise.

Between Additional Pre-Vocational Education, Strong Technology Education, Strong Vocational Education, and GO VMBO, SPV goes above and beyond to empower teachers with the attributes needed to succeed in their desired fields of work. This further manifests through the exam festival that, organised by SPV itself, is an annual activity that presents far more opportunities than one may expect. In essence, SPV concerns itself with the future, and it has equipped itself with the teachings needed to ensure that each student is able to onboard the skills required to excel far beyond their peers in any professional environment.

It achieves this feat by adopting a wholly distinct approach – one that sees it offering a large, diverse group of attractive and contemporary education models, each blending general and vocational education with practice-oriented subjects in order to maximise a students’ progression potential. Where most may overlook the importance of such a critical step, SPV has made it its mission to deliver meaningful education that’s been specifically oriented to target students’ strengths and weaknesses. In doing so, it has carved out a notable foothold in the education industry, attracting youths who are determined to participate in engaging, pre-vocational secondary tutelage. Partnered with its ability to nurture and facilitate every facet of the learning experience, SPV has created something special indeed.

When queried on why SPV opted to develop such a unique and inspired approach to pre-vocational secondary education, representative Arjen Daelmans had this to say – “Education must offer students the opportunity to develop at their own pace and level. Both pace and level can vary per subject. SPV advocates for increasing flexibility and customisation in education, where education adapts to the pace and level of a student, giving them the space to experience what they can.” Fundamentally, SPV exists to provide an engaging branch of education to secondary level learners, ensuring that, no matter what the future may hold, it will be a promising one filled with plenty of opportunities.

Since its inception, SPV has been treating students to pre-vocational secondary education that has been specifically tailored to ensure they triumph in life. As opposed to adopting a generalised approach, the organisation has gone the extra mile to outline what matters the most, and has focused on these aspects to guarantee results in a multitude of areas. It’s due to this dedication to securing the future success of students that SPV has made quite the name for itself, and it’s this very attribute that earned it the attention of EU Business News. Now, it finds itself earning recognition from the Benelux Enterprise Awards 2024 as the Best Pre-Vocational Secondary Education Provider 2024, and we can’t wait to see how this title further empowers it to foster the ongoing transformation of educational experiences for students across the region.
